

Monsters among us

I was having a conversation with my girl the other day.

We was discussing the horrors that go on around this world and about those who make them happen.

She asked me, in despair, 'how can people be so horrible?

Have they no conscience?

Don't they have any humanity at all?'

As I was considering a response, that's when it dawned on me.

Now I get it.

Here's my 2-bobs-worth.

We, as humans, see what we want to see.

I don't think this trait makes us stupid, but I think it does make us vulnerable.

Humans tend to think that other humans, who look and act like them, generally think like them - and at the very least have the same morals and principles.

At the same time, because of our conditioning, would then to think that anything that looked like the image above would be, at best, something that was malevolent.

Humans are essentially kind and loving.

So, they tend to think other humans who look like them are also kind and loving.

Also, most humans, given a choice, would rather live in peace and harmony with other humans and show them love and get love in return than live at odds with others or at war. If asked, humans will mostly tell you that the only time they really feel at peace and experience real joy is when they're also experiencing love.

I think it's a human trait to try and see good in everything and avoid unnecessary conflict. For example, most humans when meeting another for the first time, will generally give the new person the 'benefit of any doubt' and consider them harmless and will introduce themselves in a manner of friendliness, not aggression. They'll generally be looking at the possibility of forming a closer relationship with this person – maybe even making a friend of them.

Another human trait is to not be alert to the intentions of people we meet that have an agenda that is not considered 'normal' in the society we live. For example, we don't naturally assume people we meet are capable of mass-murder or genocide.

If you look at pictures of people that have ultimately demonstrated they are capable of heinous crimes against humanity very often the first thing people comment is how 'normal' they look. Take for example the following picture of Dr. Harold Shipman, Rosemary West and Ted Bundy three of the world's most prolific serial mass-murderers.

Many more will eventually be revealed once the full extent of the global genocide plan currently being played out is ultimately revealed.

I think we've got some surprises in store for us.

We would be expecting these monsters to look like the image at the beginning of this screed – but they don't.

These look like you grandfather, mum's friend and your local GP. (Well, Shipman WAS your trusted GP and he murdered over a 100 people who trusted him).

Why don't monsters at least have the decency to look like monsters?

It stands to reason, any monster that wants to prey on us knows that all it has to do to get us to accept it without reservation is simply to disguise itself to look like us – even better if it can sound like us – and better still if it can also give us the impression it has our best interest at heart.

(It's for your own good/safety).

Lastly, the fait accompli is if it can actually enrol us to help it do whatever it is it intends to do.

This not only makes it's job easier but gives it credence because of the endorsement of others. (If YOU reckon it's a good idea then maybe I'll get involved).

Downhill from here.

How did we get ourselves in this situation?

Is there anything we can do about it?

Yes – but we've got some re-learning to do.

Because of our upbringing and education, we tend to believe that the only life forms on the earth, other than animals we're familiar with, are human and look like us.

We also want to believe if they look like us, they generally think like us and have the same moral values as we do.

In short – we set ourselves up for failure. In most cases the penalty for this is inconvenience – in extreme cases it could be fatal.

This can be summed up by a realisation that humans have been programmed to be are mentally lazy.

With relatively few exceptions humans tend to accept what's presented itself in front of them as being the 'truth', without much thought – and label those who might disagree with the majority by suggesting all's not as it seems and offer an alternative opinion as a 'conspiracy' theorist.

Just think what a different situation we might be in if humans were more inclined to follow the lead of the 'conspiracy' theorists more often and think for themselves rather than opting for what they perceive to be safety by hiding amongst the majority.

Another fault humans have is their blind obedience to what they perceive to be 'authority'.

Lastly, along the same lines, is that humans seem to think there will always be a 'saviour' to rescue them from any predicament.

Movies we watched all our lives are designed to condition us to this – there's ALWAYS a hero.

NO movie ends on a bad note – the 'bad guys' invariably get eliminated and everyone else, (us), always gets saved by the hero.

Cognitive Dissonance

As a species, we are prone to a mental illness that often prevents us from seeing the bleedingly obvious. Things that we've made our mind up about prevail in our conscious actions – even when it's clear that our initial thoughts and opinions about something are just plain wrong.

Even considering an alternative is out of the question – is this because of ego? Stupidity, blindness – who know? But cognitive dissonance is very real – and could prove to be our undoing.

Likely, the biggest stumbling block for this discussion won't be the subject matter – it'll more likely be the total inability for the reader to even, (want to?), reconsider a lifetime of pre-conditioning.

David Icke has been talking about shape-shifting lizards living among us for 30 years and I was originally scoffing his ideas – and here I am 2 years later writing this thinking it's my own realisation.

Few, if any, peoples are scoffing David Icke these days

There are none so blind as those who WILL NOT see.

Imagine there are other life forms that may even live among us. Maybe some we cannot see because they exist in a different frequency to us, either because they just do or because they choose to.

And then imagine there are those we cannot see because they choose to look like us.

But though they might look like us and appear to be like us – they're not.

Consider, then, the only thing they have in common with humans is their outward appearance.

They're a completely different species – and they live a long time and regenerate themselves throughout all of our known history through ancient bloodlines which go back to the dawn of time.

They may even be visitors to Earth themselves.

We humans don't live long enough to work it out. Possibly, we're like 'cattle' to them. A source of food.

Human blood seems to be popular – particularly that from children under the age of 12.

This, then, might explain the goings-on in this world.

We're told in many screeds that in Khazaria, which seems to have been around from about 650 A.D to about 1000 A.D the inhabitants, (Khazarian Mafia), were just robbers, thieves and murderers. So bad that neighbouring countries ganged up on them and told them to clean their act up or they'd be wiped out.

We're also told that they had a knack for 'stealing the identities' of travellers and traders who made the mistake of trying to do business with them. What 'stealing the identities' means one can only imagine.

But what it suggests is that they had a talent for turning themselves into something they was not in order to deceive those who encountered them.

Then, using the money they'd stolen, they travelled throughout the world, setting themselves up in positions of power and wealth – primarily with the Royalty of England and Europe procreating to create the monied bloodlines mentioned before which are now centuries old and we take for granted

This would help to explain the interbreeding that went on, and still does.

They can't afford to marry 'out' – it could even be that Royals don't actually have their own babies.

It would also help to explain why Royals are referred to as 'blue-bloods'. The legend is that this was caused by an ongoing prevalence of haemophilia in Royal bloodlines caused by their inbreeding.

No-one will ever know what horrors this charming couple inflicted on children they took a fancy to.
One can only imagine what their children turned into.

This may indeed be the case – but is it just a coincidence that reptile blood can be many colours including a dark green pigment.

Imagine, then, that over the centuries, only interbreeding with each other or chosen incubators, their offspring continued to infiltrate every aspect human existence and power.

To us, they appear to be ‘normal’ and ‘established’ families with fabulous wealth because of passing it down through generations. (Doesn’t seem to be any inheritance tax for them).

To them, we’re still nothing but food to support them and slaves to work 3 jobs, pay taxes to increase their wealth.

And, if we could see through their façade, we’d see clearly – they’re nothing but monsters.

They have no compassion, mercy or goodwill – other than to each other, and probably not even that.

These are the creatures that rule our world.

They’re NOT human in any way other than their appearance.

Over the years, they’ve accumulated all the wealth in the world – they own ALL of Earth’s resources – including humans. But, now they reckon there’s too many of us to control and they’re afraid of being ‘sprung’, identified and eliminated by us.

And, if we don’t do something about it, quickly, we’ll be going the same way as our ancestors.

Their latest culling process has already started – and they want 90% of us GONE with the rest of us in servitude to them – maybe as mindless robots.

THEY must be eliminated if we are to thrive. We humans must bury our compassion for a while – the point is, until we eliminate them we will always be at their mercy.

They will never go away, willingly, by themselves – they got it too good here because of our complacency. Besides, they think were stupid animals – cattle – and don’t have the capacity for doing what needs to be done.

Maybe they’re right.

If they are don’t expect any mercy – the likelihood is that they’ve culled the human population many times in the past and they’re about to do it again.

This is just ‘business-as-usual’ for them.

Harvest time on Earth, (again), and we’re the harvest.

These creatures are NOT human – they must be eliminated, every last one. If we miss just one, like a cancer, one day, they’ll be back – and when they come for us again, they won’t give us a second opportunity to fight back.

Here's a few of the more obvious ones – but make no mistake, if you can recognise them for what they are, these are pretty much just the employees.

The really dangerous ones are those we don't see.

They lurk in the background.

Like vampires, they only coming out in the dark when they can't be seen and they wear disguises when they do.

Or, they assume positions of authority no-one can ever question.

Here's some more.
